THE NAUGHTER-IN-LAW.

"I never, never will forgive him," said old Mr. Remington, solemnly depositing his great gold spectacles in their green leather case.

"No," replied his daughter, "I never will forgive him either."

"But you know, my dear," suggested the old gentleman, "you could not have given him the half a century."

"Certainly we should not," said Mrs. Remington, emphatically. "To think of our only child treating us so cavalierly, Abel—the only one we've got in the world!"

"He has made his bed and must lie on it," said the old man sternly. "I will never receive his girl bride here, and so I shall write him immediately."

"We are scarcely firm enough for a Fifth Avenue daughter-in-law."

As he spoke the old man picked up a crumpled letter that he had thrown on the floor in the first paroxysms of his anger, and smoothed out its folds with a mechanical touch.

"Why, only think of it, Abel," said Mrs. Remington, "Mahala Buckley served for six weeks in this girl's cousin's family, and she says Evelyn is a man, and used to go skating with her dress all tucked up to the top of her boots, and drove a carriage, with a groom sitting behind, and—"

"Bless my soul," said the old gentleman, his breath nearly taken by the catalogue of her faults and misdemeanors. "I don't know what to say. And our Charles is married to this Amazon."

"So plain a white rose and her beauty prepared to descend, in obedience to Mr. Remington's call."

"Marian, Marian, come down and see my boy."

Charles Remington stood in the center of the room with his arm around his radiant little niece, who, with a gentleman from his big, easy chair delightedly watched over the tableau, as Marian slowly advanced.

"Charles, I don't think I shall be angry," said Marian, in a half whisper, as she placed a white rose on the mantel, and prepared to descend, in obedience to Mr. Remington's call."
